NEAR THE INTERSECTION

Yesterday, in the middle of January, a hawk swept to the road, the road I was driving down.

 Something flashed in the windshield which was already wild with sun and crashed through the branches and dove over the hurrying body of something else. I stopped on the shoulder, watching them rise over the telephone wires into the pines where the bird drew down its wings like a cloak, concealing its prize, and bent forward and went on with its plan. I can't say that I didn't shudder in the skilled presence of death, but what startled me most was the way that a curtain closed over something, shutting me out, or in, or wherever I was this side of a ravenous darkness the middle of January in the wild sun, on the road.
